Mind Your Formatting

- Introduction A typical essay will have an introductory paragraph that contains your thesis statement (or your statement of belief) and offers a bit of a tease as to WHY the reader should continue reading.
- Body The body of your essay will contain the meat of your argument. This is where you'll include relevant facts, statistics, narratives, testimonials, and more. The body is your chance to leverage various modes of persuasion too, like appeal to emotion or logic.

 Conclusion - Finally, your conclusion will offer a brief summary of what has been written. It'll reiterate how the "meat" of your essay ties back into your thesis statement and why your stance is correct. You might consider ending with a rhetorical question or some other striking comment
